Summary:

The offense itself disrupts social relations and promotes inequality, which on a macroeconomic scale is accentuated by new forms of exclusion and new technologies. From the economic analysis of law, it would be possible to understand some factors that stimulate crime, starting from the perspective that all actors in the phenomenon make their decisions rationally, as well as to seek appropriate legal and doctrinal solutions to resolve conflicts arising from the offense. In this rationality, the decision to participate in the market lawfully or unlawfully would presuppose a system of benefits and losses, something already present in Beccaria's Enlightenment but taking on various and unlimited forms in technological modernity. The State, as the main regulator of economic power and promoter of equality, must consider these factors of spontaneity in the face of new behaviors and technologies and seek the best legislative solutions, without forgetting to encourage and monitor private entities that are increasingly urged to self-regulate and contribute to the limits and responsibilities of each protagonist in the criminal phenomenon.
